LIFE IN GERMANY.

PEOPLE WHO DELIGHT IN AN OUT-OF-DOORS EXISTENCE.

A Land of Much Military Display—Maid Servants—How the Mothers Manage to Keep Their Family Secrets—Life Within the Flats.

The ground here seems fabulous in value, yet everywhere one comes unexpectedly upon inclosed spaces planted with shade trees and made delightfully attractive by rustic hints of forest seclusion, with scattered benches, flowering fountains and the odor of flowers. Here in the morning the mother sits with the little ones, looking up from knitting or embroidery to watch them at play, the nurse at hand to do their bidding. On leaving, each member of the party bows courteously to the stranger sitting near by, and the youngest child stops to make a demure courtesy which recalls the grave fashion of the minuet. Thus early in life she is impressed with the importance of social decorum. Even the strange babe in the nurse's arms extends the hand as we pass each other on the stairway. Everywhere the children are remembered. Those who do not leave the city for the summer come from their homes to live in the gardens and parks, all of which have commodious spaces for their play grounds.

LOVE OF FOREST LIFE.
This love of forest life is a survival of the taste which Tacitus ascribed to the old Teutons. Here, out of doors, one catches glimpses of thoroughly German life. The tiniest child has a butterfly, her butterfly has a flower for lunch, while the boys have their gymnastic exercises and games. Such life is an elysium for the nurses.

There is much military display in the city. Everywhere there are bright uniforms, and the flashing of guns and sword-hilts enlivens the city's streets with that sort of glamour which is always fascinating to childish eyes. A German maid is ready at any moment to do an errand, or come to the door, or to be in the way of one's omelette. It is the old story of the fascination of gilt buttons and epaulets. You see them lingering at the fountains, where the pitchers are filled, for a chat with some soldier—and soldier are ubiquitous here. If suddenly a house should be unroofed without the knowledge of its occupants, and one could see its inmost life revealed, these flats of five or six stories, so recent as we gaze upon them in passing by, a whole city full of them, so that one estimates its area perpendicularly instead of horizontally—who has their secrets.

The maid servants all have their rooms in the mansard attic, "under the roof," as they say here, and at night with twelve or more maids in one room, one knows there must be much gossip. The postman comes five times daily; it is known who has received letters and what the possible contents are; who has a new ball dress; who has redigned an old one. These revelations under the eaves, how varied in theme! How lively in recital! How provocative of inferences! The romance of the young people, the daily menu, the probable bank account, all this is in the nightly review. Matrons complain, but find no remedy. Then the older members discuss affairs not meant for the ears of servants or little ones. They speak in French, and children demurely say: "I shall be glad when my French lessons begin, then I, too, can hear the family secrets."

LIFE WITHIN THE FLATS.
This life within the flats is all novel and invested with that air of romance which a foreign atmosphere always gives. There are no open fireplaces, tall white porcelain stoves reaching to the ceiling. The floors are waxed and immaculately neat. At the windows there are lace curtains, behind these white shiffrs. They are drawn into cloud-like puffs. They are technically known as "clouds," and one sees them everywhere—particularly at all the palace windows. Next the glass, these "envy curtains," whose function is to prevent a sight of the interior. The windowsills are broad—the windows open within the shape of a double door, with hinges. Outside there are permanent venetian blinds, either green or gray, convertible into a slanting awning at a single touch. Thus German windows, the eyes of the house, as it were, are intricate in their furnishing.

For comfort in looking out there are broad, luxurious cushions, patiently embroidered in the tent-stitch. This embroidery repeats itself everywhere, on every occasion, and enters largely into the life of every frau. It is a matter of sentiment that gifts should represent the skill of the giver, and it is always somebody's birthday, or the anniversary of some event. Even the birthday of the strange visitor is not permitted to pass unnoticed. Glimpse with me at the hand-embroidery in this room. Table cover, sofa cushions, paper rack, writing mat, box cover, the rug before the writing desk, the slippers of the host, the apron of the hostess, all represent weeks of labor. No German lady sits with idle hands, even when entertaining company. —Stuttgart Cor. Courier-Journal.
